Against the backdrop of current developments, I was going through my archive recently, searching for old negatives from Wuhan. In 2002 and 2004, I was traveling along the Yangtze River from Chongqing to Wuhan in order to photograph the construction works of the Three Gorges Dam Project. The series shows the demolition of an existing environment and its reconstruction in a higher location. Entire towns along the Yangtze have been pulled down and razed to the ground. Today, the dam has raised the water level by 175 meters and these landscapes no longer exist. The construction of the dam was a heavily discussed and highly controversial project. Eighteen years later, the ecological damage in a huge area in two Chinese provinces is still not entirely clear. The aim of the Chinese central government was not only the generation of energy. Instead, the construction of the dam was part of a master plan that intended to develop the Chinese hinterland. Accordingly, Wuhan and Chongqing grew to modern megacities during that time.

Back home, I started to doubt the truthfulness of classical photojournalism. The dystopian images fulfilled their purpose and my photographs looked exactly like I expected them to be. The results were satisfying for me but they also made me skeptical about the content of information. The transfer from analogue to digital photography during that time enhanced my distrust in the documentary image even further. I felt a dilemma: I wanted to continue my documentary-style work as an artist but could not take the responsibility for it any more.

Over the years, I focused on the limitations of photography in its capacity to represent reality. I started to define documentary photography as a type of archaeology. Photographs of the earth's surface which documented its transformation through progress, discovery and expansion received their right to exist through my archive. But still I was falling in the same trap. The esthetics of my pictures collided with the reality. Over the years my suspiciousness about the true image shaped my strategies in my work. Based on the knowledge that all photographs are always linked to specific esthetics and visual narratives, I started to construct an obviously fictional world around my topics. Finally, I am no longer concerned when the results are identical with my imagination! It is remarkable that with strategies of obvious exaggeration and venture I am coming surprisingly close to the truth. My recent series Mountains of Kong (2016), Terminal (2018) and The Inner World – The Edge of Photography (2016–ongoing) are results of this development.
